

Power companies have not unequivocally demonstrated that there will be no radio interference, especially to HF spectrum users such as Military, Business, Amateur Radio. This technology is not really needed since consumers and businesses are already being served with two or more competing technologies; therefore, there is no overriding public need for BPL-- and since the delivery of BPL without interference to others is not realistic, this proposal should be rejected.